The present invention relates to an imaging pickup element in which holes are provided for the light receiving elements to enhance sensitivity. In order to obtain an optimum image from a silver halide photosensitive material, it is important to control the quantity of light to fall on the photosensitive material, that is, to obtain a proper exposure. The output of the photosensitive material is a function of the quantity of light exposure and the aperture ratio of the photosensitive material. Thus, when the aperture ratio (hole area) of a photosensitive material is small, it is difficult to obtain an optimum exposure. In this case, the sensitivity of the photosensitive material is lowered. Therefore, a photosensitive material having a hole area of around 1/10 of that of normal glass (normally, the aperture ratio is around 1.5) has been conventionally used. The present invention is to provide a photosensitive material in which holes are formed in the light receiving element side of the photosensitive material, and the sensitivity is enhanced. It is the first object of the present invention to provide an
